Park there is a small structure built into the embankment of the south side of the rose garden that looks like an unpretentious vault. A closer inspection reveals a protruding short chimney stack, and likewise the true mission of the structure. It is the boiler house which warms the Victoria Regia pond, in the upper part of the rose garden.

Since the early part of June, the time when seedlings of this royal lily were placed in the pond, the boiler house has been doing duty, an attendant being on hand during the day to see that the water in the pond is maintained at the south side of the south side and unusual in men seekling employment, but Carter differs from others in being a man who says that last May he linished a term of fifteen years in a Mexican prison.

There is no plant without its history, but few have a more interesting story connected with their discovery and introduction into the civilized floricultural world than this lily.

Unfortunately, he was attacked with illness and lost his spacimens, and was thus deprived of the satisfaction of carrying the plant to Europe.
